2022 YEAR IN REVIEW

The Seattle real estate market seems to be out to prove the old "tortoise and the hare" fable. The tale the numbers are telling is that when you don't boom big, you're likely not to bust big. 2022 was a year of steady growth and a lot less fear than in surrounding cities.

On average in a 2022 total look back, Seattle's median price was up 10% (to $940,000) over $852,000 in 2021. Most of this gain was realized in the first half of the year, and unfortunately eroded in the second half of the year—when combined, it paints a fairly clear picture that we're back to a "normal" market coming into 2023.

Queen Anne-Magnolia (up 17%), West Seattle (up 14%) and the Central District (up 13%) all fared better than average. Kenmore hung in at a 6% gain, which, given the volatility of interest rates and speculation, is still a respectable number for the year!

The headline for this year is that overall transaction volume was down in a big way. In Seattle, there were a total of 8,173 homes that sold; this is down 30% from the 11,670 sales we saw the year before. The slower market is not, however, creating a climate of fear where homeowners jump to cash out at the peak. New listings for the year were down a total of 13%.

We'll be watching closely in 2023. If consumer confidence builds with the stabilization of interest rates, we're going to have an even larger inventory crisis than we've faced in years past.
